INFORMATION ON PANEL DISCUSSIONS SCHEDULED FOR 8 SEPTEMBER 2005

Parliaments' contribution to democracy

Room 1 (UN Conference Building), 10 a.m. to 1 p.m.

While parliament is widely acknowledged as a key institution of democracy and the international community generally agrees on what its broad functions are, deeper reflection is required on how parliaments exercise or should exercise that role.

This panel discussion should help to broaden the plenary debate and provide further thoughts for the project which the IPU has launched to clarify the contribution parliaments make to democracy. The project analyses the various functions of parliaments and the institutional practices and requirements for the institution to function effectively. It is expected to identify a set of good parliamentary practices which should be encouraged and supported not only by parliaments themselves but also by the donor community and the community of democracy practitioners in general.

The panel discussion will be open to the participants in the Second World Conference of Speakers of Parliaments and to the diplomatic and NGO community at the United Nations in New York. Leading figures from these three backgrounds will deliver keynote statements at the opening of the panel discussion, to be followed by an open debate.

No outcome document will be issued. Rather, the rapporteur of the working group on the above-mentioned project will summarize the highlights of the proceedings. He will use the inputs from the participants to enrich the text of the manual on parliamentary good practice that will be issued in March 2006 in the context of this project.

Role and responsibilities of parliaments as regards the work of the United Nations

Room 1 (UN Conference Building), 3.30 to 6.30 p.m.

At a time when the United Nations is in the throes of reform, it is natural that parliaments should wish to help make the exercise a success. At the same time, the argument is increasingly heard that the United Nations needs to consolidate its links with the people for whom it works. The world body, it is said, should be more democratic and more attuned to the wishes of the voiceless masses. The people's elected representatives in parliament seem to have a legitimate place in the business of the United Nations, but what is their role? Is there an argument for a more assertive presence? To what extent should the relationship be channeled through the IPU? What, in sum, are the responsibilities that the legislatures of the world should be shouldering in the multilateral arena?

The panel discussion will be open to the participants in the Second World Conference of Speakers of Parliaments and to the diplomatic and NGO community at the United Nations in New York. Leading figures from these three backgrounds will deliver keynote statements at the opening of the panel discussion, to be followed by an open debate.
